Use Matrix as an alternative to Discord. Here is a pro-Trump Matrix server you can join.

Run your own Matrix server. My "group" made the switch three days ago and shut down the Discord server. We also left Signal. I'm not going to trash talk Signal as I only have suspicions based on its participants and promoters.

The funny thing is the cops aren't doing anything about the BLM that wants them dead. Honestly, I don't give a fuck anymore, if I see a cop in trouble, I'm going to walk right by because if BLM doesn't keep them busy then the cops will come after patriots.

Any suggestions as to how? We can have distributed storage via torrents so that caches of important information are stored all over the world and can pop up and reseed others. We could upload things into a distributed storage system, but which one?. We could have message boards on the dark web as a place to go when the main system gets shut down, sort of like 4chan. I2P could be useful.

We have to do something because we will be under relentless attack.

Can't your isp just shut you down if you're on usenet? And isn't it limited to people with the same isp? Forgive me if I'm wrong I haven't used usenet since mailer days

– SuperDuty4x4 2 points 16 days ago +2 / -0

Your ISP can always shut you down, but I doubt they would for usenet, most ISP used to host their own usenet servers.

You are not limited to people with the same ISP, usenet servers communicate and replicate posts between each other. If we had something like alt.politics.theDonald the people hosting the servers could decide to not replicate the group, just like any host could block any site.

It wouldn't be perfect, just an option.

I'm not a huge fan of AJ - I think some of the stuff he goes wayyyy out there... I do think it's entertaining though - to see someone that jacked up - it's not a bad thing to be jacked up HIGH ON FREEDOM!! Anyway, I see it like this - the guy is the canary in the colemine... It was like a sanity check when they cancelled AJ I was like OH NO, OH HELL NO!! So I was pretty pissed when they banned AJ.. cuz if they do it to him and no consequence, they do it to all of us! wait until the "lawmakers" implement government controls to control the Internet - something like that net neutrality style shit - I bet that had a framework in it to bring us to the point of INTERNET ejection of "unfavorable" types that don't toe the communist line.. Seems like we're in an upside down clown world right now..

For the record I was pretty pissed when they shutdown those americasfrontline doctors about HCQ claims too! I was like - these people are Medical Doctors and they blocked up all videos, website host, I'm surprised they didn't remove the DNS entry.. this is fugggin nuts!

I like ProtonVPN (and mail) you can route through a secure core. And even without anything to hide there no harm. Who knows how something seemingly innocuous to you can be construed.

In reality as long as your other vpn is safe I don't think there too much difference. The one thing I do like is the ability to route through a vpn in the US and then through their secure core (I use their Swiss core) which makes it harder to get subpoenas for since the jurisdictions change. Also Switzerland actually has some decent privacy laws.

Actually, as someone who does have a bit of a computer security background, you really aren't all that far off.

Basic security is pretty cheap though, and it makes spying on us, if not cheaper, then at least more expensive.

Cryptography itself is actually pretty solid, provided you can keep the system performing it from being compromised. So, if you and a friend have laptops that you don't put on the net, use those to encrypt messages in AES, put those messages on an external drive, and then move that drive between you (or equivalently send it's contents over a network using a different machine), then the contents of that message should be resistant to even state level attackers.

VPN is easy but you gotta pay. I use express vpn, they operate in a british territory but supposedly safe from 5 eyes.

There are sites that list territories, it usually involves just paying the subscription, downloading the app and it just runs in the background. You can choose what country your IP serves from so they don't know where you are.

Forking and controlling the mining are very different things. Whoever controls mining can literally rewrite the blockchain. That's The most extreme, but they can definitely set whatever fee they want. Recently, I tried to send bitcoin and the fee would have been $5. Miners gouge people now. And, as I said, most big mining appears to be in China and has been for years. This is just one site that enumerates a few, with the top 6 based in China.

There's no way Tor would handle the traffic of this site. However a good use of a .onion site is a single simple text page linking to the current page of thedonald and the next couple backups. That way if win/xyz/one/space get cuckshmucked then there's a consistent place to find and regroup.

a website with a .onion address is only resolved inside the tor network and it's much like generating a crypto coin address. They aren't doled out in neat little names like most websites we're used to. Most .onion sites look like gibberish. It's so difficult to get a particular name that Facebook had to use a supercomputer crunching for a long time to finally generate a single address with facebook in the letters.

Because they're generated and not assigned, you can have a .onion address resolve to a local server and no one can take the permission to have that address away, nor block others' ability to reach it. At least, in theory.

The downside is you need to use tor browser or an operating system that runs tor, like Tails.

He's talking about decentralization. It's great for preventing censorship and outside interference. I haven't messed with zeronet too much so I can't say, but starting a decentralized server off of gnusocial or mastodon is not too hard and we can run as many as we want.

this doesnt prevent censorship in the longrun, anything that is susceptible to a 51% attack means whoever controls the majority of the node, controls the entire network.

That is not a good option for anything.

Dark web is not covered by normal indexing. If search engines like Yandex can pick it up, then it is not on the dark web. So you need to know where exactly you're going to get there. You also need the means to get there. So Tor can get you to a place you already know exists that has less monitoring. Normies won't accidentally find it.

Get brave browser, it has built in TOR functionality. TOR - the onion router, allows you to access .onion sites, which up until now was just drugs, hitmen and child pronz. Decentralization means a websites information is hosted on multiple computers in a network, instead of one single server (like.win) that is easy to shut off.

Dark net = Tor Browser = no tracing of who we are or where we are. I'm not the guy to explain how it exactly works, but basically criminals use it for everything. Anything from drugs, hitman, to secret chats. The reason being is because the servers (I think) are switching and moving, so they are impossible to track. Unlike the browsers everyday people use everyday.

You don't need it. If you're not tech savvy and aren't comfortable working through that stuff on your own, you're better off focusing on face-to-face stuff in the real world. That's the one thing absolutely everyone needs to be doing. Meaningful info will make its way around, like it'd go from 4chan or other places to here, or from here to Infowars/more mainstream sites and wherever else.

But everyone sitting on the internet won't accomplish shit in the long run. Just start looking out for each other. There is ZERO reason we should have to worry about getting "cancelled" or fired by lefty faggots when there's 70+ million of us. I remember seeing a lot of posts about people caravanning and even carpooling when they went to DC. Build on stuff like that.

It's a scary time to be a conservative. We're not Americans anymore, America is no more.

We're the hunted now. Follow it through. Voted for Trump? Expect to be audited. Expect to be fired unexpectedly. Expect to be turned down for government services. Expect to be turned down for jobs. Expect to be arrested and harassed. Expect to be attacked, and your attacker never accused or arrested. Expect to be prevented from travel by air. Expect to have your assets seized. Expect to be forced to bend a knee.

Expect the worst. Because they have ALL the power now. Larping about military tribunals and secret last minute plans are childish.

Welcome to Post-America, where your choice in an election can mark you for life. And in some cases, for death.

THIS is why Trump had to win. He didn't. Now we reap the whirlwind.

When the new sessions of the House and Senate meet, it's gonna get uglier. Just watch. This is the future I didn't want, which is why I voted for and supported Trump.

Do you have freedom of speech? They might not prosecute you for saying what you think but the rest do. You get fired from your job or lose your income, businesses ban you and might even close your bank accounts like they did to Alex Jones. If you still have not submitted by then they try and cancel your family one by one.

But the site was made possible, by people with a dream.

It was made once, and if it's removed it can be made again.

We know what the worst,case scenario is, so what is there to be afraid of ?

The source code for the site doesn't go away if it's taken down.

It's not like destroying a building.
